143. Belleview

6600 Upper River Road

Joseph and Selena Bell purchased the land for the farm in 1854. The house has two primary facades. The Ohio River facade is unusual in that it calls on the regional architecture of the Bell's homestate of New York for its detailing. Basically Greek Revival in execution, the upper story is fitted with small, rectangular, six-paned casement windows. The River Road facade appears as a one-and-one-half story dormered cottage.

144. Barber House / Rosewell

6415 Transylvania

Rosewell was built on land once owned by Transylvania Seminary of Lexington, Kentucky. The house was built about 1851, and was designed by Henry Whitestone and Isaiah Rogers, one of Louisville's most important 19th century architectural partnerships. The house is Greek Revival in style with its slightly projecting central bay and corner pilasters.

145. Trigg House

222 Covered Bridge Road

This Italianate farmhouse was built in the 1860s by James Trigg, a native of nearby Oldham County. The bracketed cornices and ornate details around the windows are made of cast iron. This house was later owned by James and Margaret Wathen Edwards and by Mark and Willie Snow Etheridge. Mark Etheridge was publisher of The Courier-Journal and Willie Snow Etheridge was an author.

146. Rose Island

U.S. 42 to Rose Island Road

Rose Island was located on the Indiana shore of the Ohio River at Fourteen Mile Creek. The site was not actually an island but a picnic ground on the river. Entrepreneur David B.G. Rose developed the spot into an amusement site in the 1920s. Complete with a pool, dance pavilion, and a self-styled zoo, the park was accessible from downtown Louisville by way of the steamer "America." The 1937 Flood demolished the resort.
